Permission to consult the BOPC Archives or to obtain a copy of such material does not convey the right to use or publish in any manner the material subject to copyright. Such rights are secured only with the permission of the holder of copyright. The holder of copyright may be the writer or creator, the writer or creator's heirs or assigns the writer or creator's literary executor or other designated legal representative. Other legal restrictions in addition to copyright, such as privacy, publicity and trademark rights, may also limit a researcher's use of the BOPC Archives.

When permission to use or publish is granted, the researcher agrees to give proper acknowledgment to the BOPC Archives as the source of materials. Although the Archives will not require researchers to request permission to use or publish copies of material from its collections that are in the public domain, i.e., material with expired copyrights or otherwise ineligible for copyright protection, as a matter of good scholarly practice, we request that researchers still acknowledge the BOPC Archives as the owner and source of such materials. Notwithstanding any assistance the BOPC Archives may provide researchers to help identify materials that are in the public domain, the responsibility for determining whether a work is in the public domain or subject to copyright, as well as any liability arising from such determination or researcher's use of the material, shall rest solely with the researcher.
